"Strategic customers" are "top of mind" for Africa 2 Communication More than half (57%) of African telecoms operators surveyed that are taking part in such alliances are concerned that a merger or strategic partnership would cause them to miss an opportunity to increase their market share, the digital communications firm found. The research found that a significant (41%) number of African telecoms operators are considering a merger, and the "double-whammy" effect this will have on their ability to grow their customer base and the services they offer. Of those telecoms operators that have already merged with a partner, more than three-quarters (76%) said that their decision had been driven by the opportunity to enter the European market. Technology transformation Two years ago, we published a similar survey of 5,000 operators that found 22% were concerned that their merger would destroy the independent identity of their brand and more than half (56%) said they didn't know if their customers would buy more or less from the combined entity. We've come a long way since then. By 2016, the number of companies that said they were concerned about being swallowed up has more than halved, and more than half (53%) said they were confident that their customers would buy the combined business more or less as they are at present. It's been a process of technology transformation, both for the companies themselves and the decision-makers inside them. In 2017, most of the respondents (84%) said their top priority was to continue to deploy transformative, customer-focused networks and products. They said the most
