Since the beginning of the 21st century, the speed and widespread use of information technologies such as the Internet has reduced the time and labor costs associated with delivering a customer with the product, or products, that they want. As used herein, the term “product” is intended to include the tangible and intangible assets needed to make or enable a customer's needs, wants or desire to be satisfied. These products include, but are not limited to: services, articles (e.g., books, CD's, DVD's, technical manuals, and electronic manuals) and/or any of the attendant or subsidiary items (e.g., packaging, shipping materials, marketing materials) that may have to be provided to complete a customer purchase or transaction. In the practice of Electronic Commerce, the terms “E-business”, “business-to-business” or “B2B” can be used to refer to the exchange of information in support of commercial transactions. E-Business is defined as the automation and interactive use of electronic communication technologies to improve and enable the processes of business-to-business, business-to-consumer, and consumer-to-consumer transactions, in any area of business. E-Business can be used in many industries, including, but not limited to, retail, wholesale, finance, marketing and services. Information can be disseminated to a large group of users in minutes or seconds, or in fractions of minutes or seconds, thus eliminating a much larger bottleneck associated with traditional methods. Information can be transmitted electronically, resulting in a decrease in the cost of delivering information. For example, the public Internet provides a global vehicle for the delivery of information, products and services. Since the invention of e-commerce, the Internet is considered as a dominant channel for the distribution of business information. For example, retailers, catalog companies, service providers, and professional advisers, as well as individual users, have recognized the Internet as the preferred vehicle for the distribution of their business information, and have dedicated substantial resources to building and maintaining an information presence on the Internet. For instance, the number of Internet users is estimated to grow from five hundred million in 2000 to six billion by 2005. Not surprisingly, traditional Internet businesses have developed sophisticated methods for building customer relationships, for keeping customers informed about their products and services, and for delivering them to the end user. E-commerce businesses have also developed sophisticated methods for the delivery of products and services from retailers to the end user. As a
