Soniface was created in the spring of 2013 as a hobby. Our intention was to design a new touch-based instrument platform that would give the player a chance to create music from the ground up, while keeping it fun and intuitive. We've been fortunate enough to receive great feedback from users and ended up improving the user experience significantly over time. Now, the instrument is ready to create music. Whether for a solo performance, collaboration or creating material to save for your iPhone, Soniface is ready for you. The new version, 1.3, includes further improvements to performance, provides a link to the Soniface Facebook page, and the user interface is now available as an app. Each player uses a triangular selection to control a virtual instrument via the touch screen. Each note is generated on the fly based on the position of the player's finger on the screen. This makes it intuitive to use, even if you have never used an iPhone before. The app provides three different modes. Playing, arranger and mixer, plus a "free mode" where the player can create material without restrictions. With 2.0 we started offering the possibility to record every single note, as well as loop and record short notes, which is something you can not do on iOS. With this update, we have added the traditional "percussions", a nifty little feature that allows you to control the spectrum or spread of your notes with a percussive sweep across the screen. This will allow you to create music which resembles percussion instruments such as marimbas, vibraphones, triangles,... And thanks to the continuous playback of the sound in “free mode”, you will be able to practice all kinds of interesting musical effects without ever having to hit the “stop” button! A significant part of the app is concerned with the user interface. In version 1.3, we’ve entirely redesigned it to improve usability and visual quality. We’ve taken on the famous Material Design language and made everything consistent in order to be able to create a broader, more consistent experience for both casual players and experienced users. The old look will no longer be available, but the app will retain the original concept. You can’t use the app without the Soniface “leadsheet”, a free lite version of the app with a limited amount of features and content. There will be a paid version of the
